JD Vance has said that a long-term peace agreement with Iran could be important for the national interest of the United States.

In an interview with Fox News on Monday (June 8), he noted that although the United States and Israel share many strategic interests in the Middle East, there are also areas where their positions differ.

Vance said the recent regional situation has created an environment where a lasting understanding on Iran's nuclear program may now be possible. He also expressed support for President Donald Trump's position on the issue.

He added that Israel may not fully support such an agreement, but emphasized that Washington is prioritizing its own security and strategic interests.

Analysts view his remarks as a signal of a potential shift in U.S. diplomatic messaging toward the Middle East.
